To have awareness of these questions, he states, is to have a "tragic sense of life." Unamuno makes his argument over twelve chapters, originally written as a series of essays. These essays build on one another, each with a relatively small number of core ideas, perhaps two or three.

Book Review: "Tragic Sense of Life" by Miguel de Unamuno

But the world suffers, and suffering is the sense of the flesh of reality; it is the spirit's sense of its mass and substance; it is the self's sense of its own tangibility; it is immediate reality. Suffering is the substance of life and the root of personality, for it is only suffering that makes us persons.
