The Secret Language Of Color

Color illuminates everything in the universe. How many colors can humans see? A whopping 10 million! But all of those colors that we see aren't what a bat, a dog, or a pigeon see. Different brains see different colors and, believe it or not, our color vision pales in comparison to that of birds, butterflies, reptiles, and fish.

The Secret Language of Color

The "secret" they set out to celebrate is that the language of color is irreducibly subjective—its expressive power a product as much of slippery psychology as of intricate physics and chemistry. The retina, as they explain, discriminates among millions of light-wave combinations, converting radiant energy into electrochemical energy.

The Secret Language of Color Part 1: Building Powerful Color Palettes. To create this palette, you simply select two sets of complementary colors. For example, if we chose red, our complementary color would be green (the color directly across red on the color wheel). Then, if we chose dark blue, our second complementary color would be orange. The color palette would then include red, green, dark blue and orange.
