Claiming to predict the future is an endeavor that almost no "religious text" other than the Bible will attempt. The obvious reason is the writers or "gods" behind these texts have no power to know the future. These texts [Koran, Book of Mormon, Book of the Dead, etc.] make great claims and supposedly reveal great truths, but they contain no prophecy unique to them to establish these "truths."

"Sometimes all you need is a little love. HHR". This story follows the basic outline of The Deathly Hallows, with a few twists and turns to make it fit into the story being told, the story of how the love Harry and Hermione share creates a barrier so strong nothing can penetrate it, and because of the devotion they have to one another, near impossible things are made possible.

A tipping point is a watershed moment in space or time, beyond which things play out differently from before; a point of inevitability. The climax of a narrative, the moment your tires begin to slip on an icy road, the chain of runaway business and bank failures started on Black Monday -- these are all examples of tipping points.
