Those ideas are what make The Sibyl a very rewarding read, but also what make me feel like you could write a doctoral thesis on this book and still not necessarily grasp all of the nuances of Lagerkvist's thoughts. I don't think Lagerkvist was necessarily hostile to religion, but he was not afraid of portraying its darker aspects.

The Sibyl listens enigmatically to the stranger's grief. Then, to the stranger's confusion, she asks about the mother of the criminal. If that man were truly the son of god, that mother would be the mother of god or at least of god's son. The Sybil then tells the stranger her own story; the bulk of this novella is the Sibyl's narration.
