Mark Lawson is one of my favourite radio presenters; I love his sharp, easy, comic style. I was really looking forward to this novel. Reading the blurb, I was expecting something far more lightweight: a Tom Sharpeish romp through the lives of the well-heeled in these recessionary times, so The Deaths took me very much by surprise.

The Deaths, by Mark Lawson | Financial Times

"The Deaths is a fine, acerbic satire nailed to the frame of a pacy police procedural. As with his earlier novels – particularly 2005's Enough is Enough – the pleasure of reading Lawson's prose is in the observational detail, the sardonic humour, the mirror held up to the present day (there's a good riff on Cameron/Brookes "lol" confusion).

Let me start my review by definitively stating that British author Mark Lawson's novel, "The Deaths", is about, oh, 75 pages too long. Weighing in at 465 pages, Lawson's "tome" could have been/should have been shorter. He could have told his story in fewer pages.

Mark Lawson's new novel is a wonderfully entertaining dark comedy of manners. This novel cleverly combines two areas of Mark's interests and insights. Firstly Mark's love of crime fiction is shown in a brilliantly conceived and (literally) executed crime story. A series of murders are committed on the first pages.
