Not the Booker prize: The Canal by Lee Rourke. The canal of the book's title is a particularly strong presence. Rourke describes its dark banks well: its trolley-littered bed, its murky depths, its surface covered in flotsam and streaks of oily pollution. But he also makes it seem a place of appealingly gentle wonder; a place where,...

The Canal, By Lee Rourke. In this respect, Rourke is firmly aligning himself with his influences – Beckett, Ballard, Jean-Philippe Toussaint – but The Canal feels as though it is stepping out into its own territory. Modern urban life is captured here with precision – from feral youth gangs to migrant workers, from businessmen conducting...

I first heard about Lee Rourke's The Canal on John Self's Asylum. John's review indicated that it was a novel about boredom, and having grown up with the edict that "intelligent people never get bored" I was intrigued to see how it was possible to write a story about this subject that wasn't — how should I say this? — boring.
