From the very beginning, Apple always had a flair for marketing. Mike Markkula believed that a fledgling venture needed to act like a successful company if it wanted to become one, at least in terms of external perception, and Steve Jobs always insisted on the highest possible production values, even while Apple was still in the garage.

In his Life of William Blake (1863) Alexander Gilchrist warned his readers that Blake "neither wrote nor drew for the many, hardly for work'y-day men at all, rather for children and angels; himself 'a divine child,' whose playthings were sun, moon, and stars, the heavens and the earth." Yet Blake himself believed that his writings were of national importance and that they could be understood ...

For young people today, life without the World Wide Web may seem unimaginable, yet the Web is less than 25 years old, and its inventor is still among us, still in the prime of his working life, still guiding the destiny of his revolutionary creation. As a student at Oxford, Tim Berners-Lee built his own computer with a soldering iron from spare parts and an old television set.
