Alex Garland: The Coma. On the printed page, these striking cuts of black and white lack the definition and form of photographs or even drawings; instead, they register as dark Rorschach blotches, absorbing interpretation rather than dispensing it. Written in the ruthlessly pared-down language of a screenplay—which only seems natural,...

Man gets attacked on train, goes into coma, wakes up—or does he? Though British author Garland started out writing cinematically inspired, densely layered backpacker fiction like The Beach (1997) and The Tesseract (1999), his newest goes for something more terse, more abstract, and, ultimately, less interesting. Carl is taking the tube home late from work, still penning marks on some papers ...
