dumbfounding is why the MCAS only takes data from 1 angle of attack sensor. We have been flying airplanes since the . A better question is why did Boeing decide that the AoA disagreement sensor or protocol or whatever it is was an "optional" thing to put on the plane and why did they upcharge the airlines to have that in their plane?

The alternative truth about who invented the first successful airplane and made the first successful flight of mankind is controversial. Gustave Whitehead is said to be have successfully flown a powered aeroplane of his own invention - closer to the design of modern planes than the Wright Flyer 1 - successfully taking off and landing during the period 1901-1903, on multiple occasions.

Why wasn't Gustave Whitehead credited with "first flight ...
