In the same year, LEGO's founder Ole Kirk Christiansen bought a plastic injection machine from a salesman who demonstrated the type of toys that could be produced with it by showing him some Kiddicraft play sets. This was only meant to be an example of the machine's capabilities, but Christiansen had a better idea: doing the exact same thing and calling it by another name.

They were some of the biggest stars in the sports world and weren't even cashing checks to play the game. That's the beautiful and bizarre world of NCAA basketball. College programs are a rotating door, churning out student athletes every four years (if they're there that long), but that's all this list of NCAA stars needed to leave an everlasting impression on their program and the nation.

In my post celebrating the Fourteenth Anniversary of Incinerating Presuppositionalism, I mentioned that I'd be willing to entertain requests from readers if they'd like to see a certain topic or argument addressed here. One reader named Joe (thank you, Joe!) suggested that I interact with Douglas Wilson's "fizzing" gambit, the notion that, as Joe puts it, "if we are just chemicals ...
