I'm glad you chose the quote from Data. It's such an interesting moment, and one very few other dramas could have even pulled off. Out of context, his words would probably sound like arrogance, but we know his character to be incapable of that, and Brent Spiner's delivery is perfect to the task of leaving that read off the table.

In the mythology of William Blake, Urizen (/ ' j ũ r ɪ z ə n /) is the embodiment of conventional reason and law. He is usually depicted as a bearded old man; he sometimes bears architect's tools, to create and constrain the universe; or nets, with which he ensnares people in webs of law and conventional society. Originally, Urizen represented one half of a two-part system, with him ...

Objection 1. It would seem that every pleasure is evil. For that which destroys prudence and hinders the use of reason, seems to be evil in itself: since man's good is to be "in accord with reason," as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv). But pleasure destroys prudence and hinders the use of reason; and so much the more, as the pleasure is greater: wherefore "in sexual pleasures," which are the ...
